Our Process

We use a photo imaging process that involves a physical reaction between special inks and the base coating. Under controlled conditions of 'heat and pressure' photographic images are fused directly into the special base coating. The image carries a wood look which is transferred into the powder coated surface, then the film is removed and disposed of. The process is called sublimation. The finished product is as robust as standard powder coating, you couldn't chip the wood look without removing the powder coating as well.

There are many options of woodgrain, most choose to go with Black Wattle or Rimu.
